<The Series Thinking about the Environment> シリーズ環境を考える なるほど、そうだったのか

~ The 118th [Aim to 100% renewable energy] 第118回目指せ！再エネ100%

Cool: It's the middle of March and the weather is getting warmer.

What kind of year was it for you, Eco?

Eco: I have learned a lot about the environment. I even cooked a soybean meat dish! But I feel like it was a year in which we felt the effects of global warming, with linear precipitation zones occurring here and there from summer to fall, and heavy snowfall on the Sea of Japan side in winter.

Cool: That's right. If we don't take more measures against global warming than ever before, we may start to see more and more serious damage. But on the other hand, methods to generate electricity using natural energy such as wind and water are becoming more and more popular.

Eco: You mean renewable energy, right?

Cool: That's right. It is also called "renewable energy" for short. It is said to play an important role against global warming. There are countries in the world that have achieved "100% renewable energy," which means that all the electricity used in their country is generated from renewable energy.

Eco: I didn't know there was such an amazing country! Which country is it?

Cool: Iceland is a country of fire and ice. Iceland is a country with so many volcanoes and glaciers that it is called the land of fire and ice. 80% of its energy comes from hydroelectric power generation and 20% from geothermal power generation. Several other countries have achieved almost 100% renewable energy. By the way, Japan's renewable energy rate is about 20%.

Eco: We have to do more effort. Are there any renewable energy resources in Japan to achieve 100% renewable energy?

Cool: Of course. Japan is surrounded by the sea, so there is wind power generation on the sea, and there is also geothermal power generation, as there are hot springs all over Japan. Geothermal power generation in particular is getting a lot of attention. Wind power generation requires wind, and solar power generation requires sunlight. However, geothermal power generation can always generate stable energy.

Eco: I see! I hope it will spread more widely. It is difficult to build a renewable energy facility by myself, but I will do my best not to waste the electricity that is produced!
